Suzanne is a self-identified revolutionist. She is constantly on the go, trying to push the world into what she deems right. Suzanne lived her youth in the seventies, and has a rebellious ember that lives within her. Growing up, she turned her back on “the man” and fought for “the cause”. This caused her to stray away from technology and dig her heels into the ground, not giving into high tech gadgets.

These days, Suzanne is teaching Civil Rights at the local Community College. Her class is a mandatory intro for liberal arts and history. Therefore, Suzanne has large lecture halls. Her Dean has made it mandatory to use a Clicker system due to her “strike” against submitting grades. Did we mention Suzanne is tenured? Her lack of computer time shows in her skills, and she struggles with using the keyboard and internet. Unable to see clearly from all her rave days, she leans into the screen determined to find information and input data for students.
